Culture:

Seychellois culture is a direct result of the islands colourful history of exploration, slavery and plantation life. Explorers and slaves alike brought with them their own cultures, customs and beliefs resulting in a culture explosion and fusion which lead to the miss matched, sometimes contradictory, yet fascinating Seychellois culture of today where simultaneous belief in the church and witch craft and speaking Creole and English is nothing out of the ordinary.

Language:

The Seychelles has three official languages; English, French and Creole with Creole as the main language spoken by everyone. Creole is derived from C17th French yet is dotted with a few African words and expressions resulting in a language that echoes the history of the slaves and one of the countries who tried to claim Seychelles as its own.

Many of Seychelles inhabitants, especially those in the service/tourism industries who often deal with foreigners, are also well versed in German and Italian although never having received any formal training in said languages.

Family/Marriage

Seychellois house holds often consist of an extended family arrangement with grandparents, aunts, uncles and siblings living together in harmony under one roof.

No pressure is put on children to move out so it is also not unusual for a 'thirty-something' to be living at home. One generally only moves out only when moving in with a life partner.

Wedding ceremonies follow that of a typically traditional wedding, bride beautiful in her white dress as vows are exchanged after which a huge reception is held.

Religion

Approximately 90% of Seychellois are Christians with 89% of them being Catholic. On Sundays churches can be seen packed with brightly dressed figures all in their Sunday best. Religious feasts such as Easter and The Assumption of Mary are celebrations to be seen! Seychelles also has a small congregation of Muslims, Hindus and Bahais who festivals are a colour full site with street processions and bright costumes. (See festivals and events).

Black magic

With the arrival of African and Malagasy slaves, came the introduction of witchcraft, superstitions and gris-gris. Gris-gris is a form of black magic and herbalism used to gain revenge, increase one's luck or even to gain the love of that someone special. It was outlawed by Britain in 1958 but survived underground for a time. It was believed that if you put a chicken bone under the pillow of the one you want to be with, they would confess their undying love to you. The practice of wakes is another result of gri-gris. It was believed that during the first night of a person death, a black magician could come and steal the body and turn the deceased into a zombie or mummy. Hence the wake – to keep watch over the deceased lest he come back as something dark and evil.

Music & Dance

Music and dance lie at the core of Seychellois culture and was, during the time of slavery, one of very few ways in which slaves could express themselves. Musical instruments consisted mainly of drums (Tamtam) and tambour and string instruments such as the zez and mouloumpa. Today, Seychelles music is influence largely by country and western and reggae/rap leading to the introduction of guitars, violins and keyboards.

There are two main traditional dances in Seychelles, the Sega doused in African flavour and the Moutya fuelled by the anger and suppression of mixed race slaves. The Sega consists of people dancing by swaying their hips and shuffling their feet around a fire to the beating of drums while lyrics recounting events of every day life sail through the air.

The Moutya is a more erotic version of the Sega and is accompanied by a potent brew consisting of coconut palm sap mixed with sugar to give it an extra kick. Dancing starts off slowly in time to the beat of the drums, but speeds up and becomes more erotic as the beating becomes faster and faster and faster.

Art

Seychelles is coloured by a number of artist and a variety of art forms including painting, sculpting, batik and jewellery making. Art works generally depict sensual scenery, tropical vegetation and the browns of beaches and blues of the oceans who tease them. On Mahe there are a number of art galleries exhibiting work of famous artists including Michael Adams and Edgard Marday. (Please see Places of Interest)

Cuisine

Creole cuisine draws from a variety of culinary styles resulting in tastes to please every pallet. With curry's from India, rice dishes and stir fries from China, garlic, ginger and herbs from France, rice and fish (the country's staple diet) is turned into mouth watering dishes every time. Among the Seychellois favorites are tec tec soup (made from small white shells collected off the beach), fruit bat stew, shark chutney and millionaires salad (made from palm hearts). Favorite beverages include EKU or Seybrew beer, brewed and bottled in Seychelles, as well as citronella and vanilla tea.

Flora

With almost 50% of its total land mass set aside for conservation it is not difficult to fathom that Seychelles is teeming with a number of endemic specimens found nowhere else on earth. Its unique topography of sandy shores, thick forests and mountains is what makes it possible for the islands to support such a diverse collection of flora.

One of the most well known endemic species is the Coco de mer. It is found growing wild on only two of the 115 islands of the Seychelles, Praslin and Curieuse. Its nut, consisting of two halves joined in the centre, is the largest in the world and can easily weigh more than 20kg. The Coco de Mer is one of only 6 endemic palms, all of which can be seen at the Vallee de Mai on Praslin.

Mahe Island is no stranger to unique vegetation either thanks to the 8 surviving specimens of jellyfish trees found tucked away amidst the thick mountain vegetation. Believed to be extinct, samples of this unusual tree were re-discovered in 1970. The jellyfish tree is easily identified by its flowers which look like round jellyfish minus their long tentacles.

Colouring the islands shore are 766 species of flowering plants and 85 species of fern, 69 of which are endemic to Seychelles. Within spraying distance of the sea's salty water, one will find 54 species of shrubby salt bushes and preventing coastal erosion is what is left of what once used to be miles of mangrove forests.

Glacis or weathered down granite on exposed mountain sides, do themselves act as perfect habitats for certain plants to grow. They often have small pockets filled with mosses etc which can act as fertilizer. Within these small pockets, pitcher plants grow quite comfortably. They are well known for their pitcher like receptacles which contain liquid capable of digesting insects that may fall into the pitcher.

Beneath the waves, the Seychelles is home to 350 species of red, brown and green seaweed and 8 species of sea grass. The different types of sea grass act as shelter for small fish and serves as the main diet for sea turtles.

Fauna

From its skies to the floor of its ocean, Seychelles has much to offer in terms of fauna. Most notable is its remarkable range of bird species and its giant tortoise congregation.

Endemic species of birds found on Mahe include the Scoops Owl, Seychelles Kestrel and White Eye. On Praslin one can see the Black Parrot, Seychelles Blue Pigeon and the Seychelles Cave Swiftlet. La Digue is home to the ever rare Paradise Flycatcher with Fregate housing the Black Paradise Flycatcher as well as the Cave Swiftlet. (For more information, please see 'Birding')

Seychelles has three endemic mammal species including the Seychelles fruit bat which is caught by locals and turned into a stew. Other species include the Aldabra Fruit Bat and Sheath-tailed Bat which weighs between 10 and 11 kg.

Eleven endemic species of amphibians and 16 endemic species of reptiles live on Seychelles soil including the turtles and tortoises which have become synonymous with the islands thanks to the giant land tortoise, Esmeralda. Esmeralda is a giant male tortoise who resides on Bird Island. He has slowly made his way into the Guinness Book of World Record as the largest living land tortoise weighing a total of 304kg. He is said to be approximately 214 years old and is believed to be the eldest creature on earth.
